A 7-year study of the Police Training Institute at the University of Illinois focused on the change process in this setting, the process of implementing an adult education model into the police academy and in-service training, and to suggest ways to develop a standardized training design based on adult education principles. The study began in 1992. It consisted of numerous quasi-experimental and experimental research projects. These projects used participant observation, survey research, and a combination of qualitative and quantitative methods. The researcher was also the Institute's new director and served as director/researcher through the study's completion in June 1999. The analysis focused on the history of training in Illinois, the total quality management established by the Institute's director as the major leadership technique, and the efforts to reengineer the Institute into a learning organization. The analysis also focused on the experiences and attitudes of the police recruits, and the experiences and attitudes of the instructional personnel and staff. Results revealed that the first major effort at organizational and cultural change was with the recruits and with discipline. Changes in the Institute's policies, procedures, and practices focused on making the Institute a learning organization. The standardization and integration of training became an overall goal of the institutional staff. Training trainers was crucial to this process, as well as an important element in enhancing instruction. The analysis concluded that the Institute achieved most of the goals established since 1992 and that an entire rethinking of the process of police training was necessary for training to be successful. The Institute's experience also demonstrated that change was continual, that the personnel had to continue to develop and change, and that commitment by organizational members was the central element in the successes obtained.

Every day, police officers face challenges ranging from petty annoyances to the risk of death in the line of duty. Coupled with these difficulties is, in some cases, lack of community respect for the officers despite the dangers these men and women confront while protecting the public. Exploring issues of courage, integrity, leadership, and character

Seashells are the sculpted homes of a remarkable group of animals: the molluscs. These are some of the most ancient and successful animals on the planet. But watch out. Some molluscs can kill you if you eat them. Some will kill you if you stand too close. That hasn't stopped people using shells in many ways over thousands of years. They became the first jewelry and oldest currencies; they've been used as potent symbols of sex and death, prestige and war, not to mention a nutritious (and tasty) source of food. Spirals in Time is an exuberant aquatic romp, revealing amazing tales of these undersea marvels. Helen Scales leads us on a journey into their realm, as she goes in search of everything from snails that 'fly' underwater on tiny wings to octopuses accused of stealing shells and giant mussels with golden beards that were supposedly the source of Jason's golden fleece, and learns how shells have been exchanged for human lives, tapped for mind-bending drugs and inspired advances in medical technology. Weaving through these stories are the remarkable animals that build them, creatures with fascinating tales to tell, a myriad of spiralling shells following just a few simple rules of mathematics and evolution. Shells are also bellwethers of our impact on the natural world. Some species have been overfished, others poisoned by polluted seas; perhaps most worryingly of all, molluscs are expected to fall victim to ocean acidification, a side-effect of climate change that may soon cause shells to simply melt away. But rather than dwelling on what we risk losing, Spirals in Time urges you to ponder how seashells can reconnect us with nature, and heal the rift between ourselves and the living world.

Policing strategies have gravitated toward a consensus paradigm model, commonly referred to as "community policing." This is a significant paradigm shift, yet most police academies continue to use traditional lecture-based pedagogical methods to train police officers. One possible alternative to passive lecture-based teaching is a more active problem-based learning. Problem-based methodologies consist of presenting ill-structured problems whereby an instructor facilitates and directs the students in active inquiry toward possible solutions for a specific problem. Faculty at Ferris State University, in Big Rapids Michigan, designed a police academy that uses problem-based learning as its core teaching strategy. This study explored how these police academy students perceived problem-based teaching methods influenced their learning as compared to students attending other academies still using the traditional lecture-based pedagogy. Students' preferred learning styles were also examined to determine any impact on those perceptions. This study used a quasi-experimental approach including a treatment group of forty-one students from Ferris State University's 2005/06 police academy and a control group of fifty-three students drawn from three other police academies in Michigan. All students completed an end-of-course survey examining their perceptions on acquired problem solving skills, acquired critical thinking skills, satisfaction, or beliefs that the training prepared them well to perform as a police officer. In almost all cases, the average scores from the group taught via problem-based learning were more successful, but the results revealed only statistically significant differences for one of four teaching modules. However, the open-ended questions revealed that the recruits who attended the problem-based academy had a deeper understanding of problem solving and critical thinking skills. Overall, this study parallels much of the literature discovered in the analysis of problem-based learning-teaching methodologies in the medical field. Students as a whole enjoy the experience more and indicate they learn more, but not to a greater level of statistical significance than students in the traditional program. Yet the open-ended responses revealed that thought processes were created in the problem-based group that are more in line with community policing strategies. Additional study on this topic, including cost implications, is clearly necessary.

This edited collection is concerned with the ideas, challenges, demands and framework of conditions behind police education from an international perspective. Whilst not directly concerned with a classical comparison of education concepts from different countries, the broad range of international contributors consider issues such as professionalization programmes, how higher education programmes influence police organizations, as well how higher education influences police practice in a global context. Examining a wide array of countries from Germany to China and Brazil to show the flawed nature of an education system based purely upon an approach concerned with police officer numbers, the editors of this book argue for the need for greater scientific education among police around the world to meet contemporary developments. A timely and well-informed study, this book meets a crucial gap in the literature and will serve as an important contribution to existing work on policing, crime prevention, and theoretical criminology.
