Independently Published This study involved an analysis of multiple risk factors that wind turbine tower maintenance technicians are exposed to as a result of climbing ladders. A daily part of a wind turbine tower maintenance technician's occupation involves extensive climbing of vertical wind turbine ladders which are suspected to result in the development of musculoskeletal disorders. The study involved administering wind tower technicians to an online survey of 112 questions which were written specifically to identify the risk factors, musculoskeletal disorder symptoms and working conditions which are associated with maintaining wind turbines. The study included an analysis of 30 online survey responses as well as video recordings of technicians performing wind turbine ladder climbing activities. The Great American Insurance Company

Ergonomics Task Analysis Worksheet was also utilized to augment the ergonomic analysis of the video recorded wind turbine ladder climbing activities. The results of the online survey indicated that over 80% of survey respondents reported experiencing musculoskeletal disorder symptoms due to wind turbine ladder climbing activities. A task analysis of the wind turbine ladder climbing activity indicates that it is physically stressful due to the associated technicians' routine exposure to repetitive movement, unfavorable posture, forceful exertion, temperature extreme and duration-related risk factors.
