Wong Sir's Trip: Hospital de Santa Croce, Barcelona, Spain The Hospital de Santa Croce was originally a group of buildings in Barcelona. In the 15th century, six small hospitals in central Barcelona faced financial difficulties. With the permission of Pope Pontius IX at the time, six small hospitals merged into one large hospital. In February 1401, Queen Isabella II laid the first brick to lay the foundation. It was a square-shaped, two-storey building surrounding the central garden. Opened in 1450, it is one of the oldest hospitals in Europe and even the world. Into the twentieth century, the hospital space and equipment were inadequately used, the hospital planned to rebuild or build a new hospital to find funds. The recently deceased Catalan banker Pau Gil will donate the equivalent of 30 million Euros today to build a new facility, innovative construction and advanced medical technology in Barcelona. The hospital contacted Paul's son, they met immediately. However, good things abound, it is difficult to build a hospital. First of all, the doctors raised objections. They thought that the new hospital was too remote and there were problems with funding. The legacy alone could not cope. In the end, the doctor faced the reality and agreed to build the hospital. People in the community support Paul's aspirations to build a hospital for the poor and actively donate. The plan to build a hospital eliminates all difficulties and puts it into practice. The hospital was designed by Dominik, a Catalan modernist architect.

He, Gaudi, and Pueblo were known as the three best of Catalan modernist architecture. Dominic was born on December 21, 1850, died on December 27, 1923. When studying, he first enrolled in physics and natural sciences, later specialized in architecture. In 1873, he was registered as an architect in Barcelona. He has been a director and professor at the School of Architecture of Barcelona for 45 years, has completed a number of architectural thesis and technical books. Many books have been published in newspapers and magazines. Dominic has studied painting, literature, history, and politics, played an important role in promoting the Catalan self-government movement. He has participated in numerous political groups and is one of the sponsors of the committee. After taking over the design of the hospital, he gave up his political career and devoted himself to construction projects. His style is "slow work to produce fine goods". It is delicate and gentle. It is decorated with red bricks, mosaic tiles and stained glass in large quantities. Dominic believes that "art can heal the soul" pioneered "open space" and "sunlight" treatments. The patient forgot to be in the hospital, healed in the natural environment, and let architecture and art operate on them. When planning, he introduced the concept of horticultural therapy. The central square is surrounded by multiple buildings. There is a courtyard garden in the square. Patients are exposed to fresh air and sunlight as much as possible. Each building has different medical functions, using open spaces such as high vaults to reduce the patient's sense of stress. Large windows are kept well ventilated and daylighted, incorporating daylight as part of the treatment. In order to prevent patients from traveling on the road, Dominica connected the buildings with an underground passage. He interacted with lights and stained glass to the fullest. Glass window, brick-red exterior wall, pink-tone dome, decorative arts and other elements allow patients to accelerate their recovery in comfort and joy. The pure white translucent channel makes the patient feel reborn. To commemorate the bankers who funded the construction of the hospital, there were many P or PG logos in the hospital, it was later renamed the Holy Cross Saint Paul Hospital. However, it is customary for locals to refer to St. Paul's Hospital. The hospital was built in 1901 and completed in 1930. In his lifetime, Dominic was unable to witness the completion of his masterpiece, the rest of the project was completed by Dominic's son and surrogate father. At that time, there was little money to build the hospital. It was originally planned to build 48 buildings, and only 27 were eventually built. Although the scaled-down courtyards have been simplified, the overall concept remains the same, but only 16 of them have been completed in the original style. Three years after Dominic's death, Gaudi, a Sagrada Familia architect, was hit by a tram and sent to St. Paul's Hospital for treatment. He died on June 10, 1926 at this hospital, which is still under construction. The St. Paul's Hospital is only a few hundred meters away from Gaudi's legacy of the Sagrada Familia. The body was taken from this hospital and sent to the Sagrada Familia to rest. The last road Gaudí traversed was named Gaudi Avenue. In 1991, the hospital was awarded the "George Cross". In 1997, UNESCO was listed as a World Heritage Site. With the rise of modern medical treatment, the original design of the hospital was difficult to meet the needs. If it was rebuilt, it would destroy the building itself and violate the "World Heritage" regulations. The hospital decided to keep the old building and build a new hospital in the north to solve the problem. In June 2009, all medical services were relocated to modern buildings to the north and old hospitals to the south. After restoration and reconstruction, they were changed to museums and cultural centers. They will be officially opened to the public in 2016. The Holy Cross Hospital of St. Paul is a square-shaped area. The south is the main tourist attraction. It has been transformed into a museum. The north is a newly constructed modern building that still has substantial hospital functions. Buy a ticket from the main entrance to the ticket office on the right. After buying a ticket, attach a green sticker to your body to let the staff know that it is a visitor and guide the visit. The buildings in the St. Paul's Hospital are interconnected by underground passages. When entering the underground passage covered with white tiles, natural light and ground lighting illuminate the tile passages. The underground passage is sufficient for the ambulance to pass. When Gaudi was said to have been hit by a tram, the ambulance transported him to the hospital through the underground passage. The historical exhibition area of St. Paul's Hospital has a model of the hospital and cultural relics, and briefly describes the origin of the hospital. The first floor of the west wing of the hospital was originally an office and archive room, but now it is the administrative center, and the interior is decorated with tiles. At the top of the window is a shamrock symbolizing the Catholic "Holy Trinity" as the window frame. The shamrock is a large cross made of stained glass. The hollow low wall with the text pieced together under the stained glass of the cross. The exhibits under the dome are collaged with photos from St. Paul's Hospital, like big fish in the water, floating indoors. The second floor is the original administrative center of the hospital, which is decorated with marble, colored tiles, mosaic tiles, and red bricks. The Romanesque dome is paired with pink tiles and mosaic tiles decorate every corner, marking the year the Holy Cross Hospital was started (1905). Above the spiral staircase is a large stained glass dome. The glass appears colorful under natural light. The sculpture on the side of the staircase tells the hospital to save people. The other window of the administrative center can see the Sagrada Familia. Looking out from the second floor, you can see the central square. The buildings are distributed in a horseshoe shape on the periphery of the square. The central square has a number of downward spiral staircases that connect the white underground passage. The underground passage tunnel connects the buildings. East Wing is the doctor's duty room, patient examination room, anatomy center, and inpatient registration office. The central part is now the St. Paul Foundation Office and Hospital History Archives, which contains medical history books and documents from the 15th to 20th centuries. It is one of the most important medical document collections in the world today. Twenty-seven buildings are currently open to twelve, but only four can be visited. In different exhibition halls, past medical equipment, hospital introductions, etc. are displayed. One of them is a female ward, which was built between 1914 and 1918 can accommodate 28 female patients with non-infectious diseases. The exhibition room was recreated at that time. There is a diagonal axis of the cross in the middle of the building, symbolizing the original Holy Cross Hospital. The operating room of the hospital is located at the central intersection of the cross of the building complex. The circular floor-to-ceiling windows and ivory white floor tiles make it impossible to draw a relationship with the operation. Although Holy Cross Hospital St. Paul's is a hospital for the poor, from the building to the equipment, it can be on par with the noble hospital. This is the common aspiration of funders and architects. In terms of medical treatment, the rich and the poor should be treated equally, so it is called the most beautiful hospital in the world.
