Research question(s): How will teaching and using outlining as a planning strategy impact the organization of second-grade students' summary writing? (1) How will the content quality of student summary writing improve after teaching, modeling, and scaffolding the use of outlines and writing frames? (2) How will this research on second-graders' writing organization impact a teacher's perceptions about teaching writing? Research activities: This research explores the use of outlines as a planning strategy to facilitate second-grade students' writing and impact the organization and content quality of students' summary writing. Context: The study took place in a second grade, self-contained classroom composed of a diverse group of students with a wide range of academic needs. The intervention targeted six students who represented a continuum of writing skills and abilities: Proficient, Basic, Below Basic. One of the six focus students was an English Language Learner, and one was receiving additional services for language development. Methods and data: The intervention occurred over a course of nine weeks and comprised of sixteen writing sessions. Session activities ranged from whole class, direct instruction on intervention components, small group brainstorming and practice with Step Up to Writing (Auman, 2003) graphic organizers, and independent application of outlines and writing of drafts. Data sets included pre and post parent surveys, student writing samples, teacher observations, and teacher-created newspapers documenting the students' work and community's responses. Results: From the analysis of preliminary and outcome data, students demonstrated growth in their summary writing. Improvements varied, but were noted in both the quality of structure and content of writing. Improvement in organization was demonstrated through increase in use of transition words and appropriate order of sentence structures; improvement in content quality was demonstrated through increase in details and explanation/example sentences, as well as the strength of support; in addition, overall student self-efficacy was shown to improve through teacher observation. Conclusion: The inquiry findings suggest that targeting a writing strategy with the use of supplements from a prescribed writing program, such as teaching and using informal outlines as a planning strategy prior to drafting paragraphs, may work towards improving the structure and organization of a paragraph. Findings suggest that strategies working to improve the organization of writing may also work to enhance the content quality of student work. In addition, home-school connections and teacher perceptions about teaching writing may be reinforced and strengthened through the implementation of a targeted intervention. Grade level: Elementary, Second Grade. Data collection methods: Parent surveys, teacher observations, student writing samples, parent reflections. Curriculum area(s): English Language Arts, Writing. Instructional approaches: Direct instruction (writing); collaboration; graphic organizers; outlining; writing-summary; school-community.
